Sure Looks Like the End Times Out There

Spend enough time crisscrossing the United States, and you'll become familiar with an extremely specific kind of "Christian" billboard - black background, white or yellow text, cheesy generic image, 1-800 number, commentary on sin, dead, or hopelessness. You can find them from sea to shining sea, and frankly, with the new AI generated and highly political Jesus billboards that have popped up more recently, I find a certain comfort in them. I don't think that they accomplish their goal, but I suspect that the folks behind them are at least earnest in their attempt.

However, as I drove home from my week in Asheville pretending to be a person with a real life, I joyously spotted a new billboard, which warned about the end times, and it did not leave me with massive theological issues. It was truly a revelation. Back a month-ish ago, I made my thoughts on end times predictions pretty clear and cemented why I will never gain viral fame as a pastor. We. Have. To. Stop. Predicting. The. End. Times. Scripture (including Jesus himself) make super clear that we are not going to know. It's just going to happen. Yet, in an uninterrupted chain of incorrect predictions, we've been trying for two thousand years. This is exactly what my new billboard friends said. "The end is coming. You won't know when. Be ready." In something that I didn't have on my bingo card for reality, more of us should listen to that Christian highway billboard. It really grasps the point of Scripture's approach to the end times.

All too often, the opposite approach still holds sway, and no other Scripture has suffered more from this than the Book of Revelation. We mine it constantly for even the slightest sign that the modern world aligns to its often inscrutable images and references. It gets the point that many just avoid it entirely or have no idea what the book is actually about. Readers peer into Revelation as a bad weather report of the apocalypse rather than Scripture meant to inform us about God and our relationship with God. I can't tell you how many conversations that I've had in the last decade and a half of ministry that boil down to some version of, "Obviously, we live in the end of days," "Of course, this figure in Revelation is obvious my current American political adversary," and "It sure looks like the end times out there doesn't it."

It speaks to a pervading hopelessness. Surely, things have never been worse than they are now, so this must be the end. Yet, spend much time with history, and you'll be reminded of things like the Black Death that killed one third of Europe's population or WWII with its death toll in the tens of millions and its industrialized systems to murder innocent people. What we feel doesn't relate to the reality of our historical moment, but instead, speaks to one of the great struggles of faith. How do we navigate moments when God's victory feels so very far away? If only we had a book in the Bible to help us wrestle with that exact question.

Spoilers for the end of the New Testament: We do. It's called Revelation.

We don't know this because we either avoid it or read it in a way contrary to the original author's intent. John wrote Revelation to encourage Christians to hold on even through the darkest times because no matter how bad it all looks or how far away Jesus's final victory feels, God wins in the end.

In 2020, I heard a lot of, "It sure looks like the end times out there," to the point that I taught a 12-week study on Revelation entitled, Sure Looks Like the End Times. I'll be teaching it again starting on 1/8. I wrote it so that we can stop being afraid of Revelation and stop misusing Revelation, and instead, we can start understanding it and using it as a piece of Scripture meant to help us overcome the hard stuff and hold onto hope in difficult times.

If this sounds like something that you need, I invite you to come on Thursday nights, at 6:30pm, for now until the beginning of April, or if you need a remote option, we most a Zoom link to Facebook every Thursday morning. It does sometimes look like the end times out there, but it probably isn't. Revelation is to here to help you with it all.

Vaya con Dios,
Pastor Trey
